July 2012 What can you do to prepare for an attack and what should you do if such an attack is successful? The answer is, simply put, that you should have a well-defined business continuity plan in place so that if there is a cyber attack you are able to quickly take steps to prevent significant business impacts. Properly written and implemented, a business continuity plan can help prevent disruptions to operations and important data, and help minimize the disruption that an attack can cause. By planning for cybersecurity events now, companies can reduce their chances of being unprepared in the face of a breach, and increasing the likelihood of effectively responding to a cyber incident. While it is difficult to predict the timing or the nature of such an attack, those companies that have a contingency plan in place will likely be in a better position to meet the potential challenges. A Step-By-Step Planning Process Many companies start their planning for a potential attack by first completing a risk assessment. Once it is determined that a cyber attack is a significant threat, business leaders should consider taking the following steps to help prepare for such an event: Identify the key functions or departments that are dependent on IT infrastructure, and the infrastructure itself, and create contingency plans to maintain business functions in the event of a cyber attack or data breach. Develop communications plans that will be utilized in the event of a cyber attack. These plans should include communication plans for staff, decision makers, and business customers. Devise, and test, a cybersecurity incident reporting protocol, with procedures for whom to contact and what information to report. Develop and test your response plan. Prepare to employ a phased approach to recovery, starting with identification of important functions that could be disrupted, and then working to mitigate the disruption from the breach.
